Elite Remodeling Business Update - December 2021

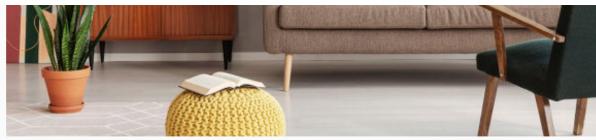

1. Lots of natural light

Without a doubt, living spaces with great views and access to daylight will remain in high demand throughout 2022. Considering how much time we spend indoors these days, emphasizing large windows, high ceilings, glass doors, and bright surfaces when designing interior areas is key to fostering positive emotions and making our homes look and feel bigger and more open.

2. More vintage than ever

Sustainability and eco-friendliness have been steadily growing in popularity for some years now, and that isn't going to change in 2022. A great way to bring that philosophy into your home is by furnishing it with vintage furniture and accessories.

This is not only more efficient and responsible than buying new, but also enables you to give your home unique and authentic details that would be difficult and expensive to reproduce with new items. Having a well-maintained vintage accessory as the centerpiece of a room demonstrates respect and care for the past while also giving your decor a unique flavor.

3. Natural materials as far as the eye can see

Buying vintage isn't the only way you can create a sustainable decor. Materials such as stone and wood are timeless in every sense of the word, and can be used to create many different interior decor styles. They're also naturally sourced and offer endless opportunities for personal expression.

4. Bright colors, patterns & textures

Hunter greens, bright blues, and strong burgundies and yellows are becoming increasingly more popular these days, as are checks, plaids, and stripes. Textured fabrics are also making a comeback, as they not only feel great to use, but also give your space a sense of luxury. Fringe in particular is expected to be in vogue next year, especially on furniture such as ottomans and sofas.

5. Bring nature right into your home

Why stop at using natural materials and letting in lots of daylight, when you can also bring authentic greenery into your living space? Plants not only complement your decor, but also purify the indoor air and give it their own unique aroma. What's more, seeing your blooms develop brings a deep sense of joy and fulfillment.

6. Versatility is the name of the game

Spending so much time at home has made us all realize the importance of making the most of our available space. This has increased the demand for areas that can be used for more than one activity, such as converting a kitchen island or a dining table into a work desk, or being able to quickly clear out a living room to make space for an in-home workout.

7. Smarter furniture

With multifunctional spaces being all the rage these days, it's no surprise that furniture manufacturers are now providing new and ingenious solutions that maximize both aesthetics and versatility. Multi-cornered couches, speakers that also act as decor, and sculptural storage solutions are just some of the available options. Many pieces even integrate technology into their design, such as remote-controlled shelves that slide open to reveal a TV, or coffee desks that contain speakers.
